There are two main reasons for this. First, the newer and more complex models, and, secondly, the increasing number of new findings which make it difficult to fit the old models. In addition, the new findings have often been so interesting that it is difficult to ignore them without changing the model. This is particularly true when the new findings are from a different area of research, such as molecular biology or neurophysiology. In this case, it is often necessary to change the model to incorporate the new findings. This can be done by either changing the model or by adding new components to it.

about Cleon. The article, though interesting, does not seem to have any bearing on the history of the Senate's powers of trial and punishment. I have, therefore, not included it in my chapter on the Senate. Besides, we can get a more accurate picture of the Senate's trial and punishment powers by looking at the Senate in its later history.
